Autonomous Board Planned To Set Bus Fares—Ben-Kharon

Transport Minister Yitzhak Ben-Kharon told the Knesset yesterday that a proposal would be presented to the Cabinet today for the establishment of an autonomous authority to set bus fares. Speaking on his Ministry's budget estimates, Mr. Ben-Kharon also said that a basic law is needed setting forth the rights and duties of the bus co-operatives.

The Minister said that the present mechanism for fixing bus fares was not sufficiently objective. In other countries, he noted, rates for public carriers were set by local judicial bodies.

As for the "basic law," that would start by setting out the rights and duties of the public in relation to the nation's roads and natural resources—that transport is the domain of the public and will be governed by the authority of the public.

The Ministry intended to take a decision by June 15 as to whether a decision should be taken from time to time as to whether transport should be run by the Government or by means of a franchise, and if by means of a franchise, under what conditions.

At present it appeared that the co-operatives were doing the job efficiently. But there must be no doubt about the ultimate authority of the State to have the last word.

And if the co-operative form of organization was used, there must be no exploitation of the public interest. This principle, too, would be incorporated in the basic law.

Mr. Ben-Kharon said he hoped that taximeters would be introduced in "the not-so-distant future." The Ministry had gone slow on this because of technical difficulties involved. But the use of taximeters would be an important step in the development of the bus system, he said.

The country's trucking industry was the very opposite of a crisis, the Minister said. The industry itself had called upon the Government to save it, and the Government was doing its best to help. The trucking industry was to be given the status of other public utilities.
